The Principle of Sufficient Reason (the PSR) which rejects brute facts has a venerable history but has also fallen out of favor. This is due, no doubt, to the exotic nature of the PSR's implications, especially monism which in one of its forms is the thesis that there is only one thing. Despite this hostile environment, the paper ventures to offer a defense of the PSR & concludes on a surprising note.

Sponsored by the Coastal Carolina Conservation League and the College of Charleston Department of Philosophy

Monday, November 12, 2012 at 6:30 p.m.
Alumni Hall of Randolph Hall
College of Charleston
Reception to follow afterwards